I regret that I can not give much credit to that worthy motive. No. By and large, it is because of the economical factor. This new method has been found to pay, and pay most handsomely; and that is the final answer. In fact, it is apparent from almost all that is written and said on the subject, that in civic and social welfare work, in the matter of disease and kindred hindrance to community interests, the questions involved are weighed more than ever with the thought of their economic quality. The demand for service is to be greater than ever before upon every dollar of capital, upon every effort of man; and it will fall nowhere more insistently than upon life insurance, which, if it would measure up to its high calling, must take the responsibility and fully qualify. The foolish, futile days of the throwing away of values worth preserving have at last gone by, never to return; and the tlay of conservation is at hand--conservation of everything of value, everything worth while. And what is of more value than human life, the very subject matter of life insurance--especially when that life needlessly squandered must not only be lost to the world.s upbuilding but must be paid for? If it is essential that before insuring an applicant the life insurance company shall determine that the applicant is in good health, then why is it not just...
